NEW QUESTION: 3

A mid-sized business is seeking a solution for a data center that handles a high volume of traffic with virtualized servers that have two 10G connections each. How does the HP 12500 switch fabric support this customer need?

- A. The intelligent, resilient fabric consists of multiple modules, creating a fabric that easily scales as bandwidth requirements increase.
- B. The distributed crossbar switch fabric reduces bottlenecks and improves performance in high-bandwidth environments.
- C. The centralized switching processors streamline traffic forwarding decisions and enhance efficiency.
- D. The CLOS switch fabric provides multiple load-balancing paths, decreasing latency in high-bandwidth environments.

Answer: D

Explanation:

12500 performance:

13.32 Tbps (12518 switch) and 6.12 Tbps (12508 switch) fully nonblocking CLOS architecture - includes a high-performance switch design with a nonblocking architecture

Note: The distinguishing characteristic of an Ethernet fabric is its ability to utilize a non-blocking Clos topology across multiple paths on multiple switches. The Clos topology was created by Charles Clos in 1953 specifically to enable the design of circuit-switched networks where the total number of paths exceeded the capacity of the largest crossbar switch. Does this problem sound familiar?

Employing a Clos topology with cut-through Ethernet switching requires the ability to switch any traffic flow to any available alternate path -- on either the same or a separate switch chassis -within a millisecond. A robust Ethernet fabric would also be able to detect and recover from a complete path failure in less than 10 milliseconds.
