NEW QUESTION: 1

A customer requires from you a minor scope change and expects you to do this without delays and additional costs. You believe that you have adequate authorization to make the decision by yourself, but you are not quite sure.

What should be your next steps?

A. Handle the request according to the integrated change control processes described in your management plans. Then make a decision together with the appropriate change control body, whether the increased customer satisfaction will be worth the extra costs, work, risks etc.

B. A requested change is always an opportunity to get more money paid by the customer and to secretly solve schedule and quality problems. You should make some reasonable estimates on time, costs, risks etc. and then add a nice margin on top of that to calculate the new price.

C. Customer satisfaction is your top priority. The customer gives you an opportunity to increase their satisfaction, which you should use to the maximum benefit. Most project managers have contingencies to cover risks; these can be used to pay the additional costs.

D. Before making a decision you should have a look at the customer's parking lot. If you find there many expensive, new models, it is likely that you can use the requested change to increase the profit from the contract. Otherwise you should reject the request.

Answer: A

NEW QUESTION: 2

In a payment run, the data entered for a payment method in the document may differ from the master data. How is this resolved by the system?

A. The payment run temporarily stops, and the system prompts you to correct the data. After you have corrected the data, the payment run continues.

B. Master data overrides document data.

C. The payment run stops and the system issues an error message.

D. Document data overrides master data.

Answer: D
