NEW QUESTION: 2

The basic UCM process uses the multiple-stream project with the integration stream as the sole shared work area. However, this approach is not recommended to support a project organization that consists of small teams of developers where each team develops a specific feature. What is the best stream hierarchy to implement in a multi-team, feature-specific UCM project?

- A. The project manager creates a single stream UCM project called Feature_A for the developers who are working on this feature. Developers, join the project at the integration stream level. They should deliver the completed work to the integration stream.

B. The project manager creates a single stream UCM project called Feature_A for the developers who are working on this feature. Developers, join the project at the integration stream level. Because it is a single stream project, developers do not need to deliver the completed work to the integration stream.

C. The project manager creates a development stream called Feature_A for the developers who are working on this feature. Developers, join the project at the Feature_A stream rather than at the project's integration stream level. They should deliver the completed work to the Feature_A stream.

D. The project manager creates an UCM project called Feature_A for the developers who are working on this feature. Developers, join the project at the integration stream level. They should deliver the completed work to the integration stream.

Answer: C
